A conventional television receiver includes a video signal processing apparatus (hereinafter referred to as a xe2x80x9creceiverxe2x80x9d) for receiving a video signal transmitted in response to a standard system (e.g., NTSC) and performing an appropriate post-processing operation (e.g., various kinds of matrix processing) on the video signal. The receiver should always operate under control of various video signal processed in response to the standard system and therefore the receiver must include a plurality of receiving circuits corresponding to the various video signal processing methods. For example, an NTSC television receiver includes receivers for NTSC, PAL, and SECAM, and the video signal processing apparatus is so constructed that the video signal after a predetermined processing operation is converted into any one of the above-mentioned video signals. However, there are cases where it is more profitable for a receiver to be able to receive and process an analog video signal (such as an NTSC video signal) under the
