Designing and conducting a patient-centered outcome evaluation of a nurse-led preventive screening program. To describe and evaluate a nurse-led educational prevention program for breast, cervical, and colorectal cancer screening. A quasi-experimental design was used. A total of 393 patients in one of two cancer prevention programs completed surveys before and after the program. The results of the Kolb experiential learning theory of experiential learning were used to describe and evaluate the experience. Results showed that the experience was well received by participants. Pre- and posttest results indicated a statistically significant increase in the knowledge of cancer prevention, as well as improvement in self-efficacy and perceived barriers of cancer prevention. In addition, a statistically significant change in the intention to have a mammogram, to go for a colorectal screening, and to complete a course in cancer prevention was observed. The study results suggest that a nurse-led prevention program for breast, cervical, and colorectal cancer screening is effective in increasing the level of knowledge, self-efficacy, and perceived barriers of cancer prevention. Further research is needed to assess the effectiveness of this nurse-led prevention program in increasing cancer screening. The influence of steric factors on the solid-liquid dispersion of 9-anthracenecarboxylic acid. The solid-liquid dispersion of 9-anthracenecarboxylic acid, a model drug of low melting point, was studied by means of X-ray diffraction. The influence of solvents on the size of the crystalline domain was studied with a series of solvents: tetrahydrofuran, butanol and hexane. The medium of crystallization was determined with water, ethanol and isopropanol. The results show that only isopropanol promotes the formation of spherical nanocrystals. Moreover, by comparison with a polymorph of 9-anthracenecarboxylic acid, the polymorph 2 with the lowest melting point was chosen for characterization by the thermal decomposition technique. Its morphology was characterized and explained by a model using the solid-liquid dispersion approach. The conditions of preparation were optimized. An alternative primer-extension approach to elucidate the evolution of trimeric RNA-polymerase
