Papillary carcinoma of the lung: an ultrastructural and immunocytochemical study. Papillary carcinoma of the lung is a distinct morphological entity with special histogenetic and cytogenetic characteristics and a variable biologic behaviour. Forty-one cases were analysed immunocytochemically and ultrastructurally. All cases were fully differentiated and the mean age of the patients was 65 years. Cellular adhesion molecules were evaluated by a panel of monoclonal antibodies including E-cadherin, N-cadherin, beta 1-integrin and alpha 6-integrin. A well-developed cell-cell junctional complex with desmosomes and hemidesmosomes was found in all cases. In addition, focal areas of intercellular tight junctions were observed in all cases. The number of desmosomes ranged from about 4 to 7/cell, whereas the number of hemidesmosomes from 1 to 4/cell. Ultrastructural analysis of the membranes of desmosomes demonstrated a rich complement of extracellular matrix proteins including fibronectin, laminin and entactin and revealed the presence of hemidesmosomal plaque-like structures. The role of cell-cell adhesion molecules in the neoplastic process is discussed. Carcinoma of the vulva. Early and late results. Seventy-six patients with a diagnosis of carcinoma of the vulva were treated at the Memorial Sloan-Kettering Cancer Center between 1961 and 1981. This represents 12.4% of the 5,903 patients treated during the same period. The early result of this treatment was analysed in relation to the clinical stage at the time of presentation and the follow-up was 75% complete. This analysis showed a trend toward improved early results as clinical stage was reduced. However, the largest number of recurrences occurred in those patients with the earliest stages and these recurrences frequently had a fatal outcome.
