Proliferation of microglia and reactive astrocytes in hippocampal dentate gyrus after electrical stimulation in the rat. Electrical stimulation of the perforant pathway was performed in freely moving rats to investigate whether such stimulation could affect both glial cells (microglia and astrocytes) in the dentate gyrus. The number of cells immunoreactive for the specific antibodies OX-42, OX-6, and S100 was examined with a Coulter Counter (Zeiss) on the entire dentate gyrus at 8, 24, 48, 72, and 96 h poststimulation. The total number of OX-42 and OX-6 immunoreactive cells increased dramatically by factor 4 and 3.2, respectively, at 96 h, while S100 immunoreactive cells increased by a factor 3.6. These data suggest that stimulation affects the glial cells as well as the neuronal cells in the dentate gyrus. These two cell types might, therefore, influence each other. The possible role of this
