More from NBC Obama: 'We can be out of Afghanistan in two years' Even as President Obama is pressing the Pentagon to come up with a strategy to continue their combat operations in Afghanistan through 2014, he admitted, "There is a real risk that this war goes on indefinitely." "Our commander in Afghanistan has said that we can be out of here in two years," Obama said in an interview with NBC News' Matt Lauer on "Today" Monday. "The enemy knows that, they also know the conditions under which we would pull out troops. So if we can set up a deal where we have a possibility of actually moving toward a political solution with the Taliban, that makes sense to me." Lauer asked the president if there is any evidence that the Taliban is about to come to the negotiating table. "Well, I think it's not -- there's a window that's open now," Obama said. "It's not like there's a deal on the table or anything. But that window is not open forever and I think as long as this becomes, for them, as expensive a proposition as it is, they're going to start thinking about how they can survive and thrive." "If they can negotiate a deal that begins to reduce the amount of funding they get from the terrorist that they support and be able to say to the world, 'This group that I was part of, we have turned our back on this organization,' as they attack the U.S. and other nations, then we can see a Taliban that is capable of being an ally of the United States," he said. Lauer asked Obama if the Taliban aren't so desperate that they'll sign a deal if it is one that they don't
